

Franz Brentano

Philosophical Investigations on Space, Time and the Continuum

Translated by Barry Smith

CROOM HELM
London • New York • Sydney

CONTENTS

Introduction by the Editors	vii
Translator's Note on Brentano's Terminology	xxiv
Part One: The Continuum	1
I. On What is Continuous	1
II. On the Measure of What is Continuous	45
Part Two: Time and Time-Consciousness	49
I. What the Philosophers Have Taught About Time	49
II. On Memory	71
III. Our Intuition of Time is a Continuum of Modes of Presentation and Acceptance	78
IV. Shortcomings of the Assumption of a Single Preterite Mode	84
V. The Real is the Temporally Continuous. There is no Internal Proteraesthesia	87
IV. If There No Longer Existed Any Things, Or Only a Timeless God, Then Nothing Would Ever Have Been	94
VII. Material and Modal Differences in What is Temporal	101
VIII. The Temporal as Relative	104
IX. On Understanding the Aristotelian Doctrine of Time	116
X. Our Intuition of Time is, Like our Intuition of Space, Indeterminate in Relation to the Absolute Specific Differences. It is Only Relatively Specified	129
Part Three: Space and Time	138
I. Nativistic, Empiricist and Anotistic Theories of our Presentation of Space	138
II. The Impenetrability of Bodies in Space Rests on the Fact That Spatial Determinations are Substantial and Individuating	150
III. What We Can Learn About Space and Time From the Conflicting Errors of the Philosophers	156
Notes by Alfred Kastil	182
Index	197